The George Fawcett Stock Company will present this week at the Academy "The Great Unknown," one of the comedies put on by Augustin Daly when he dies put on by Augustin Daly when he was at the height of his faine.

The play is an adaptation from the German, made by Mr. Daly himself. It will be seen here for the first time.

The playing of the excellent company last week impressed itself firmly on the Richmond thearte-goers. That Miss Haswell, spiendid artist that she is, has been given a fine support, was made evident well, splendid artist that she is, has been given a fine support, was made evident with the opening performance of the spring season of stock.

The play for this week was put on by the Fawcett forces in Baltimore, where it enjoyed a long and prosperous run. It is clean, clear cut comedy, with a laugh in every line, and Miss Haswell's part, that of Etna, will give her splendid opportunity, Miss Ada Rehan was starred is the role by Mr. Dally, and in the fast was John Drew, Isabel Irving, Mrs. Yeamans and Frederick Bond, the most contiler players of the day.

Neamans and Frederick Bond, the most oppular players of the day.

The story concerns the moth-like hoverings of Mrs. Arabella Jarraway around the candle of fame which invariably singes the wings of those who feel stirred by the Muse to write verses. She abandons her former occupation of New England housewife and bursts forth into gong, to the keen distress of Jeremiah sons, to the keen distress of Jeremiah Jairaway, who must and does realize thit no verse, however good, is as filling

There enters the charming widow with the stage bee in her bonnet, and she becomes something of a light in the goom of existence as handed out to Jiremiah.

goom of existence as handed out of premiah. In the play also figures a bold Irish ad, "The O'Donnell Don." He has found he little talisman that has always given the widow good luck, and which on her oss results a streak of everything going wrong. He has a proverb for everyone. He bristles with them, and has the tudacity of an adventurer. De Witt Jennings, a favorite here for years, will play the part, and it its safe to say that it jill fit him like a glove.

To give the plot in full would be to rob the play of half the pleasure it will afford. It is only necessary to say that there is a good deal in every part, and that Miss Haswell is suitably cast.

GEN. WHEELER'S RANK.

Lieutenant or Major-General, and Whence the Confusion. In the last volume of the Southern Historical Society papers (31), in a list of the generals of the Confederate States army, I inadvertantly, in the reprint of a recently published list of such, gave at page 189 the name of Joseph Wheeler among those with commissioned rank of lieutenant-general." This was a rank which the modest and valiant warrior which the modest and valuant warrior appears to have never claimed. In the valuable series published by the War Record Office of the United States government, Wheeler never signed with higher rank than as major-general, and was paroled as such. What may have given color to the misapprehension, is a statement from a correspondent that when mont from a correspondent that when President Davis sought to reach the Transmississippi Department and to join Gen. E. Kirby Smith, that Gen. Wade Hampton offered to raise for him an es-

Hampton offered to raise for him an escort of 5,000 men.

Mr. Davis declined an escort, urging that it would attract too much attention, and defeat his purpose, General Hampton then proposed that Mr. Davis would confer upon General Wheeler (who did accompany him) the title of lieutenant-general. This the President declined to do.

In a list of West Point graduates, published by the association, the rank of General Wheeler was given as lieutenant-general. This was republished in The Richmond Dispatch of the issues of Merch 30, April 6, 27 and May 12, 1802, although Captain W. Gordon McCabe, its compiler, had made the correction to the West Point publishers.

Berlin's "Marine Bride."

"The Marine Bride," one of the best known characters in the streets of Berlin, is dead. She was usually to be seen on Unter den Linden, between Friedrich was a worn looking woman, about fifty-five, shabbily dressed, although of good family, and always carried a heavy bag. Every Berliner knew her, and no one one sted the poor, demented creature. Her story is tragic. Many years ago she was betrothed to a navy surgeon, and shortly after her engagement she received news that he was drowned at sea. Her mind became unhinged, and since the day of the fatal news she has wandered along Unter den Linden, believing that her betrothed would return to Berlin, driving through the Brandenburger Thor. In the heavy bag she carried what she believed was a suit of clothes, for which her lover would exchange his sea-stained garments.—London Dally Telegraph. was a worn looking woman, about fifty
